The Great Barrier Land Harbour and Mining Company 1857

As the consequence of the state of things here slightly sketched, but sufficiently ample for their relation to the princijial objects of this history, the trade of the Danes in the East was reduced to a very low ebb at the opening of the eighteenth century. But this was not to be the finale of the Boer resistance to the wild Zulu. He remained undecided as to the mode of dealing with the emigrant Boers, however, for, while declaring them British subjects, he yet was not prepared to afford them protection from attacks of the natives.

Here our farmers have always stood in dread of the census, because they have a suspicion that it is taken with the sole object of imposing some tax, or of making some draft of men for the defence of the country.

Legislative Assembly, 3 March 1865, Province of Canada, Confederation Debates

The Boer has a strong national feeling, and although not exactly daring as a rule, he is perfectly ready to risk his life in what he believes to be a good cause. Little notice had been taken of their petitions, and the Zulus had determined to take the law into their own hands.

Legislative Assembly, 3 March 1865, Province of Canada, Confederation Debates

Water and game were plentiful, and the whole country was fertile as a garden. Wells were sunk at convenient distances along the overland route, and stock was thereby travelled with less risk. The idea of the company was not that the English trader should Chap.
