Energy Supply explained

Rural distribution power substation It is now a common practice in developed countries to monitor the primary distribution system down to 10—15 kV and to display alarm, voltage and power-flow conditions in a control room. The transmission system is owned and maintained by regional transmission companies, while the system as a whole is operated by a single System Operator SO. It was not uncommon on commercial builds of the 1960s with a three phase supply for the phase colours red, yellow, blue to be used throughout single phase sub circuits thus indicating the phase origin of the supply, in this case no over-sleeving was used and can give rise to confusion when encountered today.
