First Place Books

I've reviewed Brazen Tongue and Groaning Spinney on my blog and enjoyed both. Bradley is able to interfere at will, eventually elucidating a complicated maybe too complicated? Yet for those of us willing to make the commitment, Mitchell's best work is an absolute and abiding delight. It's not as bad as all that, but I wonder if her strong feelings about it were inspired by the realization of how great it might have been had it lived up to its potential? Curt, terrific write-up of a terrific book.

The Passing Tramp: A Forked Plot: Brazen Tongue (1940), by Gladys Mitchell

Peter's Finger 1938 , the convent setting making Mitchell more serious her younger sister was nun. Comrie and Hera embark on a long Scottish walk to test compatibility prior to marriage — corpse soon found — and then another. Bradley, which was reportedly inspired by lecture on witchcraft given by her personal friend and fellow mystery novelist, — who famously gave Mrs.

The Passing Tramp: A Forked Plot: Brazen Tongue (1940), by Gladys Mitchell

It's a slow, rather lifeless mystery, which doesn't even make much use of Mitchell's flair for local color and interest in historical sites. Bradley books, although I'll be the first to admit that the plot is as thin and preposterous as anything Mitchell ever concocted.

Faintley speaking (1986 edition)

I did look up the cave paintings and found the plot , though wildly improbable equally wildly enjoyable. Their dealings and dialogue remind us that even the rigid class system of old England allowed for plenty of friendly elbow-rubbing.

Faintley speaking (1986 edition)

She is said to have a hand in all evil going on in the village and was even implicated by the doctor in the death of her infant grandson. I do want to hear from you! Spotting the chance to make a little money while also perhaps finding inspiration for a story idea in the adventure, the penniless author sets out to retrieve the package.

Beneath the Stains of Time: Devil's Drought

. By the end of the book I was confused as to who was the murderer.
