Gender Mainstreaming in Poverty Eradication and the Millennium Development Goals

Each approach reveals something about the gender dimensions of poverty, the forms these take in different regions and how they might be affected by economic growth. There is no correlation between the GEM index and measures of basic needs and capabilities, including the HDI and GDI.

Gender Mainstreaming in Poverty Eradication and the Millennium Development Goals

Women work just 10 per cent longer than men in rural Bangladesh, where they spend 35 per cent of their total work time in System of National Accounts SNA activities. Such analysis is central to understanding: a how macroeconomic forces, filtered through the various institutions of society, impact on, and are responded to by, individual women and men in households, firms and other organisations; and b how their responses in turn feed into the wider economy. These new approaches thus accommodate the possibility of unequal power relations in the household in a way that previous models did not.

CAB Direct

The extended definition included post-harvest processing of crops; rearing livestock; construction work; collecting firewood and fetching water; making clothes, weaving and embroidery; and undertaking domestic work on a paid basis. The effects of both male and female education on per capita income were low for less developed countries where female secondary attainment covered less than 10 per cent of the population. According to the UN, industrialisation as part of globalisation is currently as much female-led as it is export-led.

Gender Mainstreaming in Poverty Eradication and the Millennium Development Goals

At the same time, they directed various welfare programmes — such as maternal and child health, family planning and nutrition — to women. Life expectancy at birth represents overall health status; a composite indicator of educational attainment adult literacy rate and combined gross school enrolment ratio represents knowledge; and real per capita Gross Domestic Product GDP represents standard of living. Economic growth may, as it suggests, be facilitated by the growth of civil and political rights.

However, Elson argued that the gender-neutrality of macroeconomic analysis was an illusion. Similarly, a study found that gender inequalities had a significant negative impact on economic growth see box 2. These were also regions with very low female participation in trading activities.

CAB Direct

For instance, analysis from 40 developing countries excluding India and China showed that excess female mortality among children is most marked in the Middle East belt and close to the median value in Latin America and sub-Saharan Africa. Then, once the surplus was absorbed, competition would set in between the sectors to retain or attract labour.

Gender Mainstreaming in Poverty Eradication and the Millennium Development Goals

The main goals concern income poverty, human development, gender equality, environmental sustainability and global partnership.
