For this reason, too, even the best attempts at exposition of King Lear are disappointing; they remind us of attempts to reduce to prose the impalpable spirit of The Tempest. And whenever there were differences such as stylistic ones, or speeches which were attributed to different characters, they would usually opt for the F solution, but occasionally they could choose Q for a more specific matter. The nearest that we have got to something like this are the divisionist critics, which have been shortly discussed above — their situation, nevertheless, is clearly different from the three previous cases.
