This book is a detailed investigation of certain general features of the modular system of Chinese timber frame construction, including, for example, measurements and proportions of individual building parts and specific features of the bracket system and roof construction. With greater distance we now see that Alvar Aalto developed a model of his own, an architecture that absorbed the presence of modern materials and technology but also drew on the types and materials of the traditional Finnish architecture.

Previously only a few illustrations and accompanying descriptive paragraphs about the imperial architecture of Chengde were available in survey books like Liu Dunzhen's; in English the architecture of this formerly Manchurian site was described primarily in early 20th-century travelogs. Many of the plans are known to researchers of Chinese cities from earlier publications in periodical articles; literature on the subject can hardly keep up with the paces of or as redrawing of plans published by Japanese archaeology or of the countless Chinese discovery publications by now teams during the years of Japanese occupation; others appear research teams spread through China's provinces and autonomous regions to be new, or at least they are previously unpublished.
