Climate Change Indicators: Ecosystems

Thompson and Wright logged several field seasons of in the region before a conversation with Ivory helped them make sense of the patterns they observed in their data. Over the past 50 years, however, humans have had a tremendous impact on their environment. Soil moisture and temperature were measured at four shallow depths in multiple locations within tundra and forested landscapes of the Agashashok River basin.

Study offers earliest evidence of humans changing ecosystems with fire

The largest areas of ecological sensitivity and biome changes predicted for this century are, not surprisingly, found in areas with the most dramatic climate change: in the Northern Hemisphere high latitudes, particularly along the northern and southern boundaries of boreal forests. They changed entire landscapes, and for better or for worse that relationship with our environments continues today. Since industrial fishing began, the total mass of commercially exploited marine species has been reduced by 90% in much of the world.

Changing Arctic Ecosystems

It could be that their fires burned out of control, or that there were simply a lot of people burning fuel in their environment that provided for warmth, cooking, or socialization, she explained.
