Criminal Man

Lombroso's psychiatric theories were conglomerated and collectively called the positivist school by his followers.

Paul Lombroso

These studies have not met with the same success as the study of the criminal type. He studied the works of art created by patients, figured out the main topics they choose subjects for their works. During his studies, he became interested in psychiatry and in 1855 began to publish articles on this subject, and in particular on cretinism.
