W. H. Davies

I go brush, brush, brush And rinse, rinse, rinse, And then when they're all clean I will blow you a kiss. Alas, the poem is yet another set piece written to please a patron and not the outpourings of a romantic soul in love. Probably he meant simply to refer to the poem itself as a relic of antiquity, and the identification of Rig as Heimdall may well have been an attempt at constructive criticism of his own.

Mr. Flood's Party by Edwin Arlington Robinson

I go brush, brush, brush And rinse, rinse, rinse, And then when they're all clean I will blow you a kiss.

Poems and Songs of Robert Burns, by Robert Burns

Key work on the traditional ballad was undertaken in the late 19th century in Denmark by and for England and Scotland by the Harvard professor. I want to go home, I want to go home. Not ever was his mouth so clean, Not ever were his teeth so green.
