Other issues discussed include economy and society in Brittany and Neustria, the impact of Carolingian imperialism on local Breton communities, changes in the political, ecclesiastical and social structures arising from Carolingian overlordship of Brittany, the interaction of Celtic and Carolingian culture, and the construction of an early medieval ethnic identity. Province and Empire: Brittany and the Carolingians.

Pascweten

It then evolved into a territorial principality during the 9th and 10th centuries. Perhaps the main interesting point is the author's ability to show that this evolution was part of an interaction between Brittany and its powerful neighbours, with the latter's ambitions and pressures forcing the Bretons to unite more or less around the counts of Vannes who most the most exposed and closest to the Franks.

Marches of Neustria

This phase was generally much less successful than the second one, simply because of the huge advantage in numbers that the Franks had. The first more or less up to Charlemagne is seen as being a reaction against Frankish encroachments.

Province and Empire: Brittany and the Carolingians by Julia M. H. Smith

After Charles' death in 888, Odo became king of the Franks and appointed margrave of the Breton March.

Province and Empire: Brittany and the Carolingians by Julia M.H. Smith

It seems to have started off as a collection of small kingdoms which had more to do with Britain and the Bretons than with the Frankish warlords who overran and occupied the rest of Gaul between the 5th and the 7th century. In 874 Pascweten, , and Wigo, son of , conspired against Salomon and assassinated him, but since each hailed from a different regional party, they soon found themselves at odds with Salomon gone.
