How Antiques Roadshow works behind the scenes, and what's changing

With the premiere of Season 24, new half-hour Recut episodes were added which are edited reruns of previous episodes from the series ; these episodes served as one of the replacement programs for , which aired its final episode in December 2019. Participants gather across the United States and the United Kingdom to show off their wares and have items valued by experts in the field. The format introduced with the previous season's Newport episodes became standard for all episodes, with each set of three episodes centering around appraisals taking place at an historic site and including frequent brief segments relating facts about the features and history of the site itself.

ANTIQUES ROADSHOW: American Stories

Only three producers are on site for any tour stop, and although they circulate to identify items that may be of interest on the show, seeking objects which probably will be the most entertaining to air on the program regardless of their assessed value, they rely heavily on the appraisers to find interesting objects and pitch them to the producers as worthy of filming. The first American episodes were taped in 1996 and broadcast on in 1997. They are seldom shown in the broadcast episodes, to spare embarrassment for the individuals involved, although counterfeit objects are sometimes included, to give experts an opportunity to explain the difference between real and fake items.
