At Tamerlane's request, Ibn Khaldūn wrote out a great deal of information, including a book-length description of the Maghreb. After he was deposed in 1090 by the invading Almoravids, he was sent into exile in Aghmāt, Morocco, where he lived out the rest of his life as a captive and wrote his memoirs in about 1094.

Brill, 1988 : 194—98; and for a response, see Michael E. Some were multilingual and chose to write in Arabic as their language of intellectual exchange, and some were exclusively Arabophone; some wrote within the geographic confines of the modern Arab world, and some wrote in Arabic even though they were far away in India, Central Asia, or the Americas.

The sīra thus became an independent work devoted to the biography of an individual; although there are far fewer of these texts than the hundreds of thousands of shorter biographical notices that have come down to us, they still constitute a sizable body of literature. Ibn Buluggīn situates his life within the history of his dynasty, evaluates his own reign, and discusses the political and military intrigues of his day.

Interpreting the Self

The second is identifying the micro-cosmological scheme of Kubrawī thought which provides the interpretative framework that establishes a correspondence between certain images and the psycho-spiritual rank of the soul. Egypt and Syria coordinated a surprise attack on Israel, who mobilized troops, technology and tactics with speed and precision. Moreover, Kubrawī authors pay attention to the contexts in which these visions emerged, explaining the influence of the senses, imagination and physical surroundings of the dreamer, which are at times represented in synaesthetic experiences.

Modern Arabic autobiographies are thus most often dealt with as romans manqués. How to say Arab-Israeli War in English? We may also note that what seem to be highly personal dream narratives often tell us much about communal and institutional structures operating in medieval Islamic society.

In the case of prominent actors on the scene, this is being done in monographs, composed of consecutive accounts, complemented by longer or shorter disconnected anecdotes, and concluded, usually subsequent to the story of his death, by a formal description of his character, illustrated again by the narration of relevant deeds, dicta, or incidents. Laroui states that if he had written Modern Arab Ideology in Arabic, its fate in the Arab world would have been neglect.

For them, the issue was not to write an auto biographical text so that such a text would exist but rather to write an account of their lives before others should do so, thus asserting control over the content and presentation of the material and preventing the spread of factual errors. Recollection functions as a method for inducing these higher visions within the practitioner by negating the outer senses and thought impressions, while allowing one to enter a state between sleep and wakefulness where the Sufi is more receptive to spiritual visions. The closest parallel among European autobiographies was written, curiously enough, by a contemporary of al-Suyūṭī, Girolamo Cardano d.
