Annoying TV pop

I guess kids were looking for something less commercial. Now wipe those images from your mind, because what we have here is another case of an English word borrowed into Japanese to mean something else.

CultureFly

Back then, computers sat on desks and were mainly for doing work, and phones were just for talking. This device was created independently by two inventors: Scottish inventor John Logie Baird and American inventor Charles Francis Jenkins. Investigation of the box's construction revealed that it was assembled not in Spain but in the United States, and investigation of its backstory concluded that the legend is fictional according to Mannis, who despite not identifying as Jewish himself claims to have invented the story of Jewish folklore and haunted Holocaust survivors to sell his box.

The Dybbuk box

The first regular colour broadcasts didn't get broadcast until 1967.
