The Path to Prosperity: Investing in Education

Findings from the Condition of Education 2002: Nontraditional Undergraduates. Educators have long been using radio and television to reach students in remote areas, but new satellite- and Internet-based technologies promise to extend distance-learning systems to a broader group of students, ranging from those in sparsely populated, remote areas to those living in dense urban agglomerations. This projection incorporates 15% growth in traditional college-age students and 10% growth in older students.
