A method of switching the signal in an MRI phantom based on trace ion currents

The novel is set in Norway's capital, and is a fierce attack on the sexual education of the time. A method for electrically changing the hydrogen nuclear magnetic resonance NMR signal intensity in a magnetic resonance imaging MRI phantom is presented.

Mannfolk is a novel from 1886 by Norwegian writer.

The method is based on creating local magnetic field inhomogeneities from impurity ion currents in a polar hydrocarbon. After the confiscation of Hans Jæger's 1885 novel Fra Kristiania-Bohømen and Christian Krohg's 1886 novel Albertine, Garborg begged the Government that his novel Mannfolk please also be confiscated. The effect is demonstrated using the propylene carbonate on an NMR spectrometer and an MRI scanner.

This effect is largest when the electric field is applied perpendicular to the static magnetic field in magnetic resonance, and is linear with applied voltage. This technique may find applications in inter and intra platform fMRI quality control.
