The WANDERER of LIVERPOOL, 1930,John Masfield,1st ED, Illustrated

And soon men looked upon a glittering earth, Intensely sparkling like a world new-born; Only to look was spiritual birth, So bright the raindrops ran along the thorn So bright they were, that one could almost pass Beyond their twinkling to the source, and know The glory pushing in the blade of grass, That hidden soul which makes the flowers grow. The tip-off probably came from him. Sometime in the mid-Seventies, my father put up a shed in the garden of the house he built in Anglesey.

His mother died giving birth to his sister when Masfield was only 6 and he went to live with his aunt.

The Wanderer poem

The verses are neither Masfield's most inspired nor polished, but they read easily, belonging to an era when poetry didn't have to be all high-fallutin', vain and arcane. Anyhow, Dad swore by these resin rich planks - according to him they'd last a hundred years; Sometime in the mid-Seventies, my father put up a shed in the garden of the house he built in Anglesey. She was graceful on the High Seas, but not good at inshore sailing; frequently she would be tugged by paddle steamers in and out of harbour, and sometimes even between Liverpool and ports in Northern Europe.

But when we rose next morning, we discerned Her beauty once again a shattered thing; Towing to dock the Wanderer returned, A wounded sea-bird with a broken wing. Soon even her masts were hidden in the haze Beyond the city; she was on her course To trample billows for a hundred days; That afternoon the northerner gathered force, Blowing a small snow from a point of east.

The Wanderer poem

There's tragedy, some humour, lots of action, and the account I've referred to above.

Upon reaching Chile, Masefield suffered from sunstroke and was hospitalized.

I had not dreamed That work of man could be so beautiful, In its own presence and in what it seemed.
