By 1464 the Crown also regulated mining in the Dean through the office of gaveller, with the role of deputy gaveller still active today. The Forest of Dean then came under the control of the of.

The Royal Forest of Dean

The culinary credentials are impeccable, with everything created by Head Chef Rob Cox, based on local suppliers and seasonal produce, yet with a relaxed sophistication that will please any well travelled foodie.

Attractions in and around The Royal Forest of Dean

While many travelers simply head for the chocolate-box lure of the nearby Cotswolds, the Forest of Dean offers something different, a fascinating and deep-rooted mix of the workaday and the picturesque, and people who, like Brian Johns, remain intimately connected with their ancient woodland heritage.

Nearby they have a small farm, where they raise livestock and grow vegetables in the kitchen garden and fruit in the orchard, for use in the restaurant. Go underground in the footsteps of the Freeminers For over a thousand years the Freeminers held an exclusive birth right to mine for iron ore, coal and stone in the caves beneath the Forest.

Forest of Dean

The tradition of independence in the area resulted in a great number of smaller and not necessarily economically successful mines.

Surrounding the Forest of Dean and Wye Valley

The giant pine cone and acorn cup were carved from locally quarried sandstone, as if the tiny details of the forest had been enlarged to enable us to notice them more clearly. Tudor Farmhouse in Forest of Dean The prize for the prettiest dish went to our shared starter of Cornish mackerel, artistically arranged with a scattering of apple, grapes, walnuts and cheese £10. The area was kept stocked with and and became important for , , and.
