» Labour and Delivery / Maternal Newborn Unit

The pattern of income falls was unambiguously inequality-reducing, with real falls as large as 5. It shows that these reforms reduced relative child poverty substantially, using a range of poverty lines, suggesting that they were not merely a tool for lifting children from just below to just above the chosen line.

This is consummate with analysis by of trends in earnings inequality between 1970 and 2010, which finds that a large part of the increase in earnings inequality since the mid-1990s can be attributed to growing inequality within the financial sector and within London. The changes under Labour between 1997 and 2010 also become much less pronounced, suggesting that trends in the Gini over this period were largely being driven by the top of the distribution. Section IV examines trends in poverty and the extent to which they reflect the policy priorities and reforms.

assessment of Labour's record on income inequality and poverty

Those income reductions were also inequality-reducing, with larger falls in income higher up the distribution. How you choose to feed your baby is your choice! However, strong growth at the top and real falls in income at the bottom acted to increase income inequality.

assessment of Labour's record on income inequality and poverty

It is extremely difficult to tell how these trends will affect overall levels of poverty and inequality going forwards. Section III analyses what happened to income inequality and what drove these trends.
