Commission on Railroad Retirement Report Major changes in the law were recommended in the Commission's 1972 report as its basic solution to the serious problems of the system. For example, the repeal of the restriction makes it possible for former railroad workers who had obtained railroad retirement benefits based on 30 years of partly or wholly untaxed service to qualify also for full Social Security benefits after as little as six quarters of employment covered by the Old Age and Survivor's Insurance provisions of the Social Security Act.

In addition, the Commission recommended a phase-out of dual railroad retirement-social security benefits with some protection for the vested rights to such benefits already acquired by employees. Provision was made for social security to assume jurisdiction of benefits for employees not having at least 10 years of railroad service, and a minimum guaranty was provided to ensure that railroad retirement benefits would be no less than the benefit, or additional benefit, the social security system would have paid on the basis of the railroad service involved. By 1970 amendments to the Act provided for regular annuities of more than double the amount provided under the original formula.
