Why capitalism is stunting science

And it sucks as a place for both wind and solar.

Verso

Excessive competition forces capitalists to make as much as they can which leads to the exploitation of workers. If capitalism was basically rigid, and the persistent co-existence of both development and underdevelopment is one of its structural features, then how did these countries manage to so magnificently develop? They plan what jobs to train for and where to offer and apply the abilities they possess.

Urban Planning under Capitalism: A Testimonial

This is not to say that capitalism created our desire for more, but rather that it encourages it—with unwelcome consequences for the quality of our lives. Employing people makes one partially responsible for their carbon footprints. I'm going to briefly discuss about a dozen or so of these insights that I consider to be the most important, and which I believe, taken all together, make the case for capitalism irresistible.

Untangling Art's relationship with Capitalism

It was the lie by the Old Labour party that capitalism can be reformed to the permanent advantage of the workforce. The preservation of the form of markets becomes an increasingly utopian project, requiring more and more active intervention by government. Because the Palestinians are better at dealing with things than the Germans? The people must have their say, but their options must be limited.

Housing: How Capitalism and Planning Can Co

This is entirely possible in terms of the resources required to manufacture the drug. Churchill just gave the second case of planning gain back to those lucky freeholders in a position to gain a planning approval, leaving everyone else without their first case UNIVERSAL development right in freehold. In the United States, cities initially implemented regulations to cut back on noxious air pollutants.
