C Both are a chronicle of events that the narrator is in the process of writing. Baudelaire is great because one feels him to be weak and he shows himself so; but he is Baudelaire and it is his having known, in part at least, how to surmount his immense weakness, which permitted him all the same to be Baudelaire, what he is for us through his work, what counts after all and despite all, what qualifies the poet. Freedom is precisely the nothingness which has been in the heart of man and which constrains the human-reality to make itself, instead of being.

Moral Philosophy footnotes 13

He has nothing to do with determining the meaning of this world-unless he misunderstands it.
