The desire on the part of the new converts to identify with the resourceful pioneers emerging from the Arabian Peninsula was yet another factor in their adoption of the language. It was the language of government during the reign of the sultan Jalal al-Din 963-1014 AH. The importance of this practice derives particularly from the fact that the use of foreign words was viewed unfavorably by a large number of Arab scholars at that time.

There is, however, another aspect of the Qur'an which has received far less attention than its theological and legislative guidance, namely its linguistic significance, for the Qur'an was undoubtedly the first book to be composed in Arabic. Islam, the Qur'an and the Arabic Literature

The inimitability as well as the linguistic significance of the Qur'an can be better understood within its pre-Islamic context and according to the role language played during that period. The pre-Islamic poet, enjoying his enviable talent for composing poetry, played multiple roles. Interest in the Qur'an, its language, and its exegesis gave rise to a number of related disciplines, which include philological, religious, and linguistic studies.

poetry were foremost among the traits of a worthy bedouin.

Furthermore, the linguistic significance of the Qur'an can also be better understood within that same context. This represents the highest degree of speech. A great majority of the Urdu scholars of the twelfth Islamic century used the medium of Arabic for their writings.

It was under the banner of Islam that Arabic spread beyond the borders of the Arabian Peninsula to far-off areas in Europe, south-east Asia, and Africa. This effect is achieved through a coherent series of events which sustain his curiosity and interest. The Qur'an also introduced a host of new themes and linguistic forms not only to the Arabic language but to the Arab mind as well.
