In this passage, the vertiginous feeling of conceiving, or trying to conceive, the idea of every possible combination that the library contains, including recursiveness and self-reflexivity, suggests the mind-boggling implications not only of Borges's library, but also of the contraptions in Lagado as well as some of the twentieth and twenty-first century writing machines that I will be referencing in the next section.

Unity: Everything in this image work together to create one shape, because it is important to know that this drawing is only one line, so everything in this drawing is technically in unity. It uses a key concept of stochastic text generation that is, randomness, which traditionally would be achieved by other means, for example rolling dice to produce text from a database of sixteen subjects and sixteen titles, in this case from Franz Kafka's The Castle. AWARDS, HONORS: Prix Goncourt, 1951, for Le rivage des Syrtes refused by author.
