REF The winner-take-all allocation of electoral votes within 48 states necessitates that a candidate be popular enough to appeal to a broad electorate, including moderate voters, and provides the winner of the presidential race with both finality and a mandate, even if his popular vote total is slightly below 50 percent.

This recount was a belabored, emotional, costly process even though it was limited to only one state. Would you certify the election of that different president as free and fair? Does anyone believe that California or New York will refrain from withdrawing from the NPVC if the Republican candidate narrowly wins the national popular vote but the Democratic candidate overwhelmingly wins the state popular vote in those states? Instead, states get the same number of electoral votes as they do representation in Congress, and whoever wins at least 270 electoral votes wins the presidency.
