From there, they could be dropped into a process on the website that would unfold privately by default. In Chapter two, Robbins theorize.

Criminology, Conflict Resolution and Restorative Justice

Because economic competitiveness is the essence of capitalism, conflict increases and eventually destabilizes social institutions and the individuals within them.

Criminology, Conflict Resolution and Restorative Justice

So, that's one idea for helping to resolve online conflict.

Restorative justice and resolving online conflict

What if they come because of the conflict? There might be a lot of value in having parts of the process happen out in the open for others to see and benefit from, so maybe they can choose that option if they're comfortable, either along the way or at the end. In cases where there is clear violation of societal norms, rules or laws, the act of such violation is non-negotiable — even if the particulars of how the situation will be satisfactorily resolved can be subject to negotiation.

Criminology, Conflict Resolution and Restorative Justice

Is there disagreement about who is responsible? People might understandably experience anger, frustration, anxiety, powerlessness or many other things in the midst of a conflict, but if there's a lack of basic psychological safety around interacting with another person involved, no online tool or process like this is going to be a good next step. But if anyone involved in or affected by the conflict was interested in a different outcome, how could they get there? Assessment: How can decision-makers and facilitators assess whether an incident might lend itself to conflict resolution or restorative justice? I think that people come to social media looking for connection, but don't really have the skills or self-awareness to really find deep connection .
