The main causes are the fright and anxiety brought about by the explosion of enemy shells and mines, and seeing maimed or dead comrades. After Charcot's death in 1893, the term traumatic neurosis made its way into French-language psychiatry: witness the Belgian psychiatrist Jean Crocq who in 1896 reported 28 cases caused by railway accidents. They were repatriated to a new post-war social environment in a French society that was itself plagued by the guilt of its early surrender to the Nazis, and they felt misunderstood by some of their countrymen who criticized their incorporation into the German military as a form of treason.
