International Economic Integration

Heterogeneous cultural preferences may be considered among the exogenously defined determinants of market equilibrium . Because a state is unlikely to bear all of the costs associated with any environment damage caused by industries in that state, it has an incentive to lower standards below the level that would be desirable if the state were forced to bear all of the costs.

Regulatory Competition and Economic Integration: Comparative Perspectives

Building such a consensus may be far from easy, at both the national and the global levels.
