In the second part the organisation of property and industry under the socialist state is described. The most important early tract was Fabian Essays in Socialism, edited by George Bernard Shaw and published in 1889. However, it was in 1900 that the Society finally published a tract drafted by George Bernard Shaw, Fabianism and the Empire, which became the most significant statement of the Society's imperial policy.

Nationalisation of land is a public duty. Educate, Agitate, Organize — George Bernard Shaw Introduction The last quarter of the nineteenth century in Britain was marked by a growing critique of laissez-faire capitalism and an upsurge of interest in socialist ideas. In the last years of the 19th century, many provincial members of the Fabian Society supported the newly established Independent Labour Party, and in 1900, the Fabians helped establish the Labour Representative Committee, which became the Labour Party in 1906.
