Public Housing in Poplar: The Inter

Nevertheless, virtually nothing was done in the 1920s to abate overcrowding, although the County Council's scheme of allowing the Borough Council to nominate some tenants to its cottage estates was in part an attempt to alleviate the problem.

Other examples of modern suburban houses include the Eichler Homes, built primarily in Northern California, and the Crestwood Hills development in Los Angeles.

Then there were the hard-headed men who chose not to enlist because they could make a better living at home as economic conditions improved from September 1914.

The notion of neighborliness often connotes the benign, minor kindnesses bestowed among co-residents that punctuate a steady state of general disregard.

In any case the LCC's own Millwall Estate, which was nearing completion, would solve any remaining rehousing problems in the district. It has shown, too, that this support came from across the social spectrum, with the city's middle and upper classes and the civic authorities providing the organisational drive.

However sympathetic the LCC might be, all three were going to suffer by having to move. Dispelling many common misconceptions about anarchism, the filmmakers depict anarchist political philosophy as the belief that people are capable of governing themselves independent of any state or hierarchical authority. Most pre-1919 corporation housing was built cheaply taking the form of high density tenement blocks of flats with small rooms and limited facilities including shared kitchen and toilets and no running hot water.

Arendt draws her notion of the public world of stable appearance from Kant; see her Lectures on Kant's Political Philosophy. Incidentally, the LCC found that it was more difficult to install baths in its older tenement blocks, since bathrooms could only be created by reducing the overall number of flats in the blocks, which, given the desperate need for dwellings, was not a viable proposition. That being said, his new book is a funny, courageous, brutally honest account of the conscious personal changes that have kept him sober for the last eleven years.
