Before the Arianism showed itself in individual instances, and French influences were widespread in the direction of deism, though they were not organized into any definite utterance by religious bodies. The CUC was formed on May 14, 1961, one day before the UUA in the United States, but the two functioned in close association until money exchange and other complications led to greater independence, with the CUC in 2002 assuming the direct delivery of services to Canadian congregations which was formerly delivered by the UUA. Instead, they asserted a unitary notion of God.

Universalist churches in contrast followed a different path, having begun as independent congregations beyond the bounds of the established churches entirely. This seems to be the result of the rising influence of a younger generation that is more attuned to spiritual values or that has had fewer bad traditional church experiences. For twenty years 1639-1659 the Arians were tolerated, but public opinion widely considered them as collaborators with Sweden during , and in 1660 the gave anti-Trinitarians the option of conformity or exile.
