Medieval Scotland History

In the late Middle Ages, new castles were built, some on a grander scale, and others, particularly in the borders, as simpler tower houses. The epic poetic history of the Brus and Wallace helped outline a narrative of united struggle against the English enemy. The re-adoption of low-massive church building with round arches and pillars, in contrast to the Gothic perpendicular style that was particularly in the late Medieval era, may have been influenced by close contacts with Rome and the Netherlands, and may have been a conscious reaction to English forms in favour of continental ones.

Medieval Architecture of Scotland

Bards probably accompanied their poetry on the , and can also be seen in records of the Scottish courts throughout the Medieval period. Examples of a more explicitly perpendicular form can be seen in Gillespie Graham's 1813 , or David Hamilton's Old 1813—14. In 1683 he was appointed to be Surveyor and Overseer of the Royal Works, and was responsible for maintenance of Holyrood Palace, and refurbished the former as a for King.
