Creatio Ex Nihilo: The Doctrine of 'Creation out of Nothing' in Early Christian Thought

I also argue that the New Testament materials do not address the issue of creatio ex nihilo and are consistent with the view of creation from a preexisting chaos. The waters were there already when God set the foundation of the earth.

Scholars of the history of Christian doctrine tell us that the idea of creation ex nihilo is a product of the hellenistic Christian era. It shows that the temporal clause is precisely the structure used to begin creation accounts in the Hebrew mind-set. Since I interact fairly frequently with May, all paginated references to his book will be in the text rather than footnoted.

Creatio ex Nihilo. The Doctrine of 'Creation out of Nothing' in Early Christian Thought.

In choosing the Middle-Platonist doctrine of God over their view of nature, he left nature entirely subject to God. This reading is confirmed by an approximately contemporaneous text, Second Enoch, that uses almost exactly similar language and clearly adopted creation of preexisting realities. The Old Testament creation accounts do not teach creation ex nihilo.

Creatio Ex Nihilo: The Doctrine of 'Creation Out of Nothing' in Early Christian Thought by Gerhard May

Hubler, Creatio ex Nihilo, 109. They were quite correct to point out that God, conceived as the Middle Platonists did, required a God who is completely independent of the world and stands over against it.
