The British Library Acquires the Visual Archive of Mervyn Peake

The publishers offered him either a flat fee of £10 or a royalty of one per book. They are sometimes compared to the work of his older contemporary, but Peake's surreal fiction was influenced by his early love for and rather than Tolkien's studies of and.

Mervyn Peake the novelist and author of Gormenghast

A 30-minute TV short film A Boy in Darkness also made in 2000 and adapted from Peake's novella was the first production from the BBC Drama Lab.

Peake, Mervyn 1911

The eyes in constellations swarm through London.

Peake, Mervyn 1911

His words go like this: But for the fact that the eye can cease to respond, the brain to absorb, the heart to miss a beat, the spirit to launch itself on a hazard of speculation, then surely, in the weird creatures that make up this dark hive called London, or for that matter the world, there would lie before us every day such a scene as haunts the brains of madmen, a delirium of heads and frames and hands, a cavalcade hardly to be suffered for the very endlessness of its inventive fantasy. He is on shakier ground, however, when he critiques Peake's creations.
