The figure of Venus conjoins earth and heaven; and, through a love of beauty, the poet discovers the object of imitation and, as an agent of the Muses, sees and expresses material signs as spiritual indicants. Although he does not directly allude to Horace in this poem, he seems to share Horace's thoughts on the source of poetic invention and on the adaptation of traditional topics to contemporary contexts. In spite of the contrasts between death and life, sterility and productivity, and indolence and energy, parallel motifs interrelate these oppositions.

It encourages the disclosure, publication and distribution of the innovative creators, to open their discovery or creation to the public rather, then keeping it as a secret. So, they require new strategies and different action plans, to be aligned with the national and international practices and treaties. By using co-citation, network visualisation through co-occurrence data, multi-dimensional scaling, and hierarchical cluster analysis, this research sheds light to the intellectual structure of social innovation including social value, economic value, societal impact, and bifocal innovations.
