Gersonides is the first Jewish philosopher to use this analytic, scholastic method. He draws his evidence from, and his argument encompasses, many of the other prehistoric remains of Britain and the northern continent of Europe - the long barrows that are dotted over southern England, the circles of Avebury, the hill carvings of the White Horse at Uffington and the Long Man of Wilmington in Sussex. Recent articles have included highly focused studies on particular facets of the medieval philosophical or theological tradition, broader reconsiderations of received views in the history of medieval theology and philosophy, and editions of texts and manuscript studies.
