Practical Reason and Theoretical

Clinical reasoning stands out as a situated, practice-based form of reasoning that requires a background of scientific and technological research-based knowledge about general cases, more so than any particular instance. A step can be shown to be rational by showing it to be a step on the way to the termination point of the action that you are in the course of performing.

Thomas Hobbes 1588—1679 and Giambattista Vico 1668—1744 stress, in different ways, that one can only know what one has made. It is a process where both inductive and deductive cognitive skills are used.

Briefly, the function of these locutions is to preempt confusion by placing the actions that make up a naive rationalization in their temporal sequence. We can imagine a society call it the action-theoretic state of nature getting by with only naive rationalization. Phronesis is also dependent on ongoing experiential learning of the practitioner, where knowledge is refined, corrected, or refuted.

Ockham also maintains that, when possible, loving God above all things is always right, subtly reconciling this with his claim that God could command us not to love Him on the grounds that given such a command it would be impossible to love Him above all things; see Quodlibet IIIq14. As Pamela Hall and Jean Porter have argued, the process of articulation involves a reflective, and developing, grasp of human nature and its tendencies, including an understanding of it and them as good.

Practical reason

One might try to establish that, as a matter of metaphysical fact, actions are as this or that theory says; alternatively, one might argue that one is to ought to, had better produce actions which are as the theory says; that is, the top-level argumentation might be either theoretical or practical. Although the intellect is required for willing in the sense that it presents objects as good to the will, willing has no cause other than the will itself. Despite their shared agreement that practical reasoning is where the action is, and the consequent willingness to accord explanatory priority to action theory in developing theories of practical rationality, these theorists differ among themselves as to what the most central features of actions are, and accordingly they disagree about what the legitimate patterns of practical inference turn out to be.

Practical Reason and Theoretical

Good ethical comportment requires that both the clinician and the scientist take into account the notions of good inherent in clinical and scientific practices. For that would amount to a viciously circular and vacuous specification of the constitutive aim of action.

Practical Reasoning Analytics

Acting on the practical moral law does not work in this way.
