History of the Irish Parliamentary Party; Volume 1: O'Donnell, F Hugh (Frank Hugh) 1848

The Irish Party came to have an increasing dependence on the AOH, though the party's attempts to crush out and 'factionism' were carried out through its national organisation, the UIL. On the one hand, its behaviour could at times be obstreperous to the point of provoking hostility from Conservative and Liberal governments alike. It was inspired by the 1868 election of and his under the slogan Justice for Ireland, and by Irish Liberals' gain of 65 of the 105 Irish seats at Westminster.

Looking at the data quantitatively — rather than simply undertaking a detailed textual examination of speech content — Wall showed that only nine out of 338 columns. Between 1910-14, however, it held the balance of power at Westminster and Redmond succeeded in restoring the question to the centre of the political stage. The party was taken by surprise by the in April 1916, launched by the section of the Irish Volunteers who had remained in the original organisation.

At the end of 1882 the organisation already had 232 branches, in 1885 increased to 592 branches. We have the admission of many of the latter, that their personal safety was seriously imperilled by the vehemence of the popular anger and regret. In the past the IPP only faced opposition from candidates at conventions within the Home Rule movement.
